QUESTION: Today, consumers are being inundated with advertising and promotional information from companies producing plant-based dairy products as being comparable or better in nutrient quality and taste to actual dairy products, such as milk, cheese and yogurt. In many cases they are using the word “milk” on labels and in advertising to capture market share.

What can be done to help consumers identify the differences between real dairy products and plant based dairy products? What is the federal Food and Drug Administration’s role in identifying the differences in the products? Additionally, what new ways can the dairy industry promote the consumption of real dairy products?
